

In this thesis we define two most common types of convergence of probability measures and show relations between them. Using examples, we show that our result is sharp. After that, we discuss weak convergence of probability measures and convergence of random variables in distribution defined by weak convergence of probability distributions. Above all, we provide a survey among various types of convergence of random variables and relations among them.